

Background

It's now nearly fifty years since Harvey Cox's ground breaking book, The Secular City (1965) described the changing urban context for the church's mission and ministry. Humankind come of age. The postsecular city is now an unanticipated and pluralist setting for the church's ministry. In their introduction to "Postsecular Cities" (2011) the co-editors describe seven areas of debate in the shift from the secular to post secular context. Author and guest speaker at the conference, Dr Chris Baker, will invite participants to explore the implications this has for mainline churches today.

On the day following the conference, Friday September 27th Chris Baker will be guest of the South Australian Council of Churches and Pilgrim Church for a half day round table between church leaders and social planners from State and local governments in SA.

Chris will also be visiting Melbourne and Sydney and information about events in these cities will be available from Rev Dr Jennifer Byrnes e mail Jennifer.Byrnes@ctm.uca.edu.au Executive Director Centre for Theology and Ministry Melbourne and the Rev Dr Clive Pearson e mail cpearson@csu.edu.au Principal of the United Theological College, Sydney (Charles Sturt University).

Leaders of other churches and agencies in Adelaide are also assisting with the program.

Religion, faith communities and spiritual values have returned to the centre of public life, especially public policy, governance, and social identity. Rapidly diversifying urban locations are the best place to witness the emergence of new spaces in which religion and spiritual traditions are creating... new alliances. Is this true for Australia?

Continuing Conversation

From October 2nd to 5th 2014, Adelaide will host the third National Conference of the Australian Association of Mission Studies. This conference will cover a wide range of topics and participants will be invited to present papers on the theology and practices of mission in the Australian context.

THE PROGRAM WILL BE IN TWO PARTS

Morning sessions will explore the big picture; including the changing character of postsecular urban locations and the implications this has for the church's ministry. These sessions will include discussion about the hybrid and pluralist nature of urban places and how congregations are responding to this changing context through their mission practices and theological insights.

Afternoon sessions, the practicum, will draw on insights from effective community development practices. CDPs are an important medium for congregations as they engage and form partnerships with their host communities.

In 2013 Uniting Communities, Adelaide will be organising a series of one day CDPs workshops. Email Rev Peter McDonald for further information.
